PROJECT DESCRIPTION

The Community and Environment Course (Community Studies 225) was the first Community Studies course of its kind at Dickinson College. The course, taught by Professors Jim Ellison and Lauren Imgrund, was intended to provide students with the knowledge and skills that would allow them to be active participants in solving environmental problems. Students in this course learn an array of social science fieldwork methods, an appreciation of how such methods are applied to ascertain community knowledge and needs, and the means to negotiate the interests and needs of local communities and local government to produce a positive environmental outcome. Students also examine the intersections of community lived experience, appropriate environmental practice, and the interests, abilities, and constraints of local government. In the Spring 2006 semester, the course focused on the issue of stormwater management, using the Borough of Carlisle as a unifying theme. Students worked together to develop a multidisciplinary project that will be of direct community benefit. They presented the preliminary results of their research at a Poster Session open to all members of the Dickinson community.

COLLECTION DESCRIPTION

The collection includes three series. Series 1 – Student Papers consists of 14 folders of papers written by Community and Environment students in Spring 2006. The papers are organized alphabetically according to author's last name.
